Steve's Bees (Whole Season)

Beekeeping has become a very chemical intensive practice, and the making of honey has involved a great deal of processing. Both these things have, in my opinion, damaged the bees and reduced the quality of the honey. I practice organic beekeeping methods and do not use antibiotics on my bees; I also use primarily non-chemical interventions on bee pests. For the honey I do as little processing as possible, with no micro-filtration and only the amount of heat of a hot day to get the honey out of the comb and quickly in my jars and then cooled. I will point out to customers that this makes the honey prone to crystalize. None of my honey will remain liquid for more than a few months. Despite what many have been told, this is not an indication that the honey has table sugar in it, but is rather a natural process of raw honey of this area. But the proof is in the tasting. Many of my customers tell me they have never had better honey. I am delighted as well when customers from other countries try my honey and say, "It tastes just like home".
